BACKGROUND

- I was interested in the history of my house on 3rd Street South, and knew about the Library of Congress archive of newspapers that are now out of publication. My house was built in 1941, so my search was for “O’Hara” and “Arlington” between January 1939 and December 1942. Per the 1940 US Census, the O’Hara family lived in their house at 4705 8th Street South in 1935, so no doubt he started building before January 1939 – this is therefore not a complete archive of ads for Barcroft homes!
- There was only one house advertised in 1942, and the name of the company doesn’t include “sons” or “son,” as it had previously. No doubt WWII intervened; per the Evening Star article in December 1942, the younger son Lewis was in the Army in 1942, stationed in Oklahoma.
- The next pages are in date order.

ARLINGTON BOULEVARD

Arlington Boulevard has a shorter history than many other major arterial roads in the region and was only built in the first half of the 20th century in several stages beginning in the west and progressing east. The entire route was complete in 1938 with the final section around Fort Myer. The road was originally called Lee Boulevard but, with Lee Highway being another major route in Northern Virginia, the name was changed to Arlington Boulevard in the early 1950s.

Between 1935-37, the US 50 designation was attached to the road even though it had yet to be completed past Glebe Road, then VA 9. Before that, the road was VA 236, a number now assigned to the nearby Little River Turnpike.

The completed Arlington Boulevard's eastern terminus was originally the crossing of the George Washington Memorial Parkway on Columbia Island in the District of Columbia. With the completion of the Theodore Roosevelt Bridge in 1964, Arlington Boulevard's terminus was moved to its present location.
